The College of Law

Mastering legal practice

Globalisation has radically altered the way in which lawyers meet the business requirements of their clients. Lawyers need to have the know-how and skills to operate across national boundaries and within multi-jurisdictional legal systems. They need to have a level of understanding about worldwide legal systems to be able to collaborate with lawyers from other jurisdictions.

The know-how and skills required of the truly international lawyer do not equate to an academic list of legal subjects. International lawyers need the specialist training, qualifications and experience to be fully equipped to meet the demands of the international commercial environment.

Since 2002, the International Bar Association (the world's leading organisation of international legal practitioners, bar associations and law societies) and the College of Law of England and Wales (Europe's largest provider of legal vocational education) have delivered international legal skills training to 1,550 lawyers from 97 jurisdictions.

In response to increasing demand, the IBA and the College of Law have launched a new type of Master of Laws (LLM) in International Legal Practice. The LL.M provides an internationally-recognised professional qualification designed to build corporate and cross-border legal knowledge and enhance the careers of law graduates and practitioners worldwide.

This Master's level degree is client focused and reflects cutting-edge approaches to international legal practice, with a choice of corporate practice areas designed with contributions from leading global law firms including Allen & Overly LLP, DLA Piper Rudnick Gray Cary LLP, Baker & McKenzie, Jausus and Tay and Partners.

The LL.M in International Legal Practice can be studied at the practitioner's desk, or at home, using innovative on-line study materials with one-to-one tutor supervision and feedback. All the tutors will be qualified practitioners. The LL.M can be studied at the student's own pace over up to five years. There are a wide range of specialist modules, allowing the student or lawyer to tailor the LL.M programme to suit his/her area of practice or interest.
